SIR GEORGE CHARLES THOMAS STEWARD

1865 -1920

Public Servant, Military Man and Chief Commissioner of Police

“Pickle the Spy”

Buried 13 May 1920

OD D 96A

Sir George Charles Thomas Steward’s life makes a wonderful story of dedicated public service and intrigue. Born on 18 March 1865 at St George in East London, son of George Steward, labourer, and his wife Susannah, née Barnes, in July 1880 he joined the London Post Office as night messenger and was a sorter of foreign parcels, 1st class, by 1890. A sculler and an amateur middleweight boxer, he was living at Stepney when he married at the parish church Edith Jermyn, a fishmonger’s daughter, on 27 December 1885. They came to Tasmania in 1892, but the marriage was unhappy and in 1894 Edith returned to London with their two sons. Steward had then a brilliant career in the colony's civil service. A clerk in the Railway Department (1892), chief clerk and accountant in the Education Department (1893), secretary to the premier and clerk of the Executive Council (1894), he was under-secretary for Tasmania in 1896. He also held additional offices, including chief inspector of explosives and supervisor of totalizators, and was briefly town clerk of Hobart (1897).
In January 1901 Steward transferred to the Commonwealth Department of External Affairs, expecting to be its head; but when Alfred Deakin secured that billet for Atlee Hunt, Steward became chief clerk. In January 1902 he conveyed to Brisbane customs officers Barton's secret instructions for administering the immigration dictation test. Uneasy working under Hunt, in December 1902 Steward became official secretary to the governor-general, Lord Tennyson, and secretary of the Executive Council. Except for six weeks in 1910, when he was Victorian land tax commissioner, for seventeen years Steward was right-hand man to five governors-general, responsible for official correspondence, including coded dispatches, and official expenditure. He was appointed C.M.G. (1909) and K.B.E. (1918).

His success however did not improve his reputation and he was criticised by some as having 'no knack of getting men to work for him otherwise than by driving them' and being 'too big for his boots', but his relations remained good with the majority of governors-general. Although Sir Ronald Munro Ferguson described him as an 'exceedingly jealous and domineering character', he also found him 'reliable and very efficient', particularly in the first weeks of World War I when the official secretary was the conduit for secret communications between Australia and Britain. Steward was described as distinguished, with a 'military bearing, his moustache rampant a la Emperor Wilhelm, and his air of hauteur', but he was as 'brusque and decisive in manner as in mind'. An enthusiastic citizen soldier, Steward claimed to have joined the Royal Engineers in 1882 and to have been a 'special duty officer'. Commissioned lieutenant, Tasmanian Auxiliary Forces, in March 1898, he had raised and commanded the Tasmanian Mounted Infantry and was captain from March 1900. He joined the 10th Australian Light Horse in 1905; as a major (1908-12), he served in the Australian Intelligence Corps. In 1915-19 he commanded the 50th Infantry (St Kilda) Regiment (as honorary lieutenant-colonel from 1917).

In 1919 Steward was appointed to succeed Sainsbury as Commissioner of Police (Vic). At the time of his appointment he had no police experience to guide him, however, he realised that apart from training in drill, the recruits should be given some elementary instructions in police duties, and he may be said to have laid the foundation of the present course of recruit training. Championing better working conditions for his men, he was popular with the force and an efficient administrator, but his health was overtaxed by his new post. He held the position of Chief Commissioner for 15 months.

More shadowy was his other role. In 1916 Steward founded and headed the Counter Espionage Bureau, Australia's first secret service, whose agents pursued International Workers of the World and Sinn Fein activists. Munro Ferguson was as unenthusiastic about these duties of his secretary (whom he dubbed 'Pickle the Spy') and the unsavoury characters who consequently lurked about Government House as he was with the secret political work which Steward sometimes performed for Prime Minister Hughes.

An 'adap't water-colourist and a temperance advocate, Steward enjoyed working on his farm at Cranbourne. He died of heart disease while driving his Cadillac in St Kilda Road on 11 May 1920 and was buried in St Kilda cemetery 'amid

Joseph Davies 1810-1885
Buried 14 July 1885

Contributed by Kay Middlemiss, Qld

Joseph was born to parents Joseph Davies, a shoe and boot manufacturer of High Street Shrewsbury, Shropshire England and Mary Tabor.

He was one of six children who were all baptised at the Swan Hill Independent church of Shrewsbury. Only Joseph and his brother Charles left Shrewsbury and ventured to London, studying to improve their chances of becoming established in their respective fields.

Joseph worked in London in 1830 employed by a well-known Chemist Mr John Bickerstaff and later Mr Edward Eamus at Aldgate Within London. It is during this time Joseph attends Quaker meeting houses where he met widow Mary Batger with three small boys Thomas, William and John, marrying Mary in 1843. Another three children were born Ellen, Mary and Joseph Tabor Davies in London.

By 1851 the chemist store now owned by Joseph Davies had expanded and was employing 12 men and was sold as a thriving business. The blended family of six children soon left London to sail to Auckland by 1855. New Zealand was home for the next 11 years. After a short time at Whangarei, the family then settled in Onehunga, Auckland. This town was known to be secure as one of four Fencible settlements. Retired soldiers left England and enlisted in exchange for land to build a house and protect newly arrived settlers. In 1855 Joseph Davies established a chemist store on the corner of Queen Street, Onehunga. A son Joseph Tabor Davies 1845-1864 enlisted to serve in the 1st Regiment of the Waikato militia and unfortunately drowned while serving in New Zealand.

Joseph's brother Charles Davies, by this time in history, was a qualified solicitor and his services were needed to continue with land acquisitions having Maori chiefs sign papers forfeiting their rights and continuing the conditions of a North Island Treaty that had begun years earlier. The two Shrewsbury brothers lived on the North Island of New Zealand for the next 10 years. Charles took his young family to Melbourne, Victoria, but Joseph Davies stayed on in New Zealand eventually selling his shop in Onehunga to a Mr Henry Thomas Watts, to continue trade in what was known as the Onehunga Medical Hall. Joseph's brother Charles died suddenly in 1869, East Melbourne, leaving a widow Margaret, with 13 children. This may have been the reason for Joseph and his family to leave New Zealand.

It is in 1871, when the death of Joseph's wife Mary is recorded, the family were living in Caulfield and later South Yarra. Two spinster daughters Mary and Ellen were the major beneficiaries of Joseph's will, as were his three stepsons who by this time have travelled far and wide, William Batger went to Sandhurst, Victoria to live, Thomas Batger to Fremantle Western Australia and John Batger lived out his days in Mount Eden, New Zealand. All gentlemen were greatly admired for their contributions to the towns they lived in. The last known address for Joseph Davies was 114 Toorak Road, South Yarra, in Victoria, Australia. A daughter Ellen Davies returned to New Zealand to live at 9 Bourne Street, Mount Eden with her step-brother John Batger and family. Ellen is buried in Purewa Cemetery in 1933 along with two nephews Arthur and John.

Joseph Davies died in 1885 and ten years later his daughter Mary Davies, late of Caulfield was deceased. St Kilda Cemetery is the final resting place of a remarkable Davies family.

Joseph my Great Great Uncle and his brother Charles my Great Great Grandfather journeyed far away from all that they knew in England to make a difference, not only in their lives, but in the lives of others, one by dispensing medical help to the sick and the other to help administer legislated changes to the New Zealand colony.

Religion featured greatly in the Davies brothers lives and they stayed true to their non-conformist beliefs from an early age in Shrewsbury, to then move away from home to study in London and as adults impart knowledge and skills overseas. New Zealand was where their fortunes were realised. Joseph could at last retire in Victoria, Australia as a Gentleman of means. Through tragedy and triumphs, adversity and celebration, they navigated an amazing history and embraced wonderful opportunities to leave a lasting influence for future generations to admire and which to be immensely proud.

Recent /news/tour/events highlights

Elizabeth Hore attended the Association of Significant Cemeteries in Europe Conference in Ghent, Belgium in October 2019. This was a wonderful collegiate event with over 150 attendees from UK, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, Greece, Italy, Slovenia and other European countries, all of whom love cemeteries. The theme of the conference was Heritage Cemeteries in the 21st Century: Use, reuse and shared use, a very relevant topic for all cemeteries in Victoria and Australia. It was wonderful opportunity to hear and share experiences with like-minded people.
